

Fig4. Average controllability differences: Cortical surface maps showing regions with significant group differences in average controllability between deaf and hearing cats. Red indicates higher controllability in deaf animals, while blue indicates higher controllability in hearing animals. At the system level, auditory regions exhibited reduced controllability in deaf animals, whereas somatosensory, motor, and prefrontal regions showed increases, suggesting a redistribution of control capacity.